

3-2014

Examining the Historical Representation of Native Americans within Children's Literature

Lauren Hunt
Eastern Illinois University

Follow this and additional works at: http://thekeep.eiu.edu/honors_theses

 Part of the Education Commons, Indigenous Studies Commons, and the United States History Commons

Recommended Citation

Hunt, Lauren, "Examining the Historical Representation of Native Americans within Children's Literature" (2014). Student Honors Theses. 1.
http://thekeep.eiu.edu/honors_theses/1

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Honors College at The Keep. It has been accepted for inclusion in Student Honors Theses by an authorized administrator of The Keep. For more information, please contact tabruns@eiu.edu.

3-2014

Examining the Historical Representation of Native Americans within Children's Literature

Lauren Hunt
Eastern Illinois University

Follow this and additional works at: http://thekeep.eiu.edu/lib_awards_2014_docs

 Part of the Elementary Education and Teaching Commons, English Language and Literature Commons, Junior High, Intermediate, Middle School Education and Teaching Commons, and the Pre-Elementary, Early Childhood, Kindergarten Teacher Education Commons

Recommended Citation

Hunt, Lauren, "Examining the Historical Representation of Native Americans within Children's Literature" (2014). 2014 Awards for Excellence in Student Research and Creative Activity Documents. Paper 4.
http://thekeep.eiu.edu/lib_awards_2014_docs/4

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the 2014 Awards for Excellence in Student Research and Creativity at The Keep. It has been accepted for inclusion in 2014 Awards for Excellence in Student Research and Creative Activity Documents by an authorized administrator of The Keep. For more information, please contact tabruns@eiu.edu.

Booth Library Eastern Illinois University
Awards for Excellence in Student Research and Creativity
2014 Entry Form

Name of Applicant: Lauren Hunt

E#: 12345812

Local Address: 1108 Johnson Avenue, Charleston, IL 61920

Home Address: 3111 Harvest Hill, Bloomington, IL 61705

Telephone: (309)830-8672

email: lmhunt@eiu.edu

Undergraduate _____ Freshman _____ Sophomore _____ Junior X Senior

Graduate Title of entry: Examining the Historical Representation of Native Americans within Children's Literature

Citation Style Used: American Psychological Association

Major: Elementary Education/Special Education Dual Certification

If the submitted work was prepared as a class assignment, please give your professor's name:

Category: (check one)

X Written work Artistic work Exhibit

Musical work Documentary Performance

Digital media Other (please describe)

Booth Library Eastern Illinois University
Awards for Excellence in Student Research and Creativity
Use of Library and/or Research Resource Narrative

Name of student applicant: Lauren Hunt

E#: 12345812

Title of entry: Examining the Historical Representation of Native Americans within Children's Literature

Booth Library, and specifically the Ballenger Teacher Center, played a large role in facilitating this content analysis research study. Before my mentor, Dr. J. Bickford, and I began the research, I checked out children's books about Native Americans from the Ballenger Teacher Center. I also used Booth Library's website to borrow more children's books about Native Americans from other libraries across the state.

Once I had all of the books, I randomly selected 15 to create a random and representative sample. Then, I read a few books and recorded observable patterns and anomalies. I presented these patterns and anomalies to my mentor, and together we created a content analysis research instrument to analyze the sample of books for historical representations and misrepresentations of Native Americans. In short, I identified tentative patterns, developed these patterns into testable codes and then tested the presence of those codes.

The books that I acquired from Booth Library laid the foundation for this study. Once the books were analyzed, my mentor and I used the information from each book's analysis to determine our findings and to identify patterns among our sample. This information was important because Native Americans are often included in elementary school curriculum. As a result, elementary school teachers often use children's literature to teach their students about Native Americans. The findings from this study proved that often times such literature is historically misrepresentative and omits important information. This omission centered on the conflicts and violence surrounding European-Native American contact. To encourage teachers to continue to use literature and best practices for teaching social studies, we provided primary sources that could serve as supplements to teachers who use children's literature to teach about historical events.

Applicant: Lauren Hunt, Elementary Education Student

Mentor: Dr. J. Bickford, Assistant Professor

Examining the Historical Representation of Native Americans within Children's Literature

In this research, I evaluated the historical representation of Native Americans in children's literature. The portrayal of Native Americans in children's literature is important because Native Americans are commonly included within elementary school social studies curriculum. For this reason, teachers should know how the literature they select historically represents Native Americans. This historical representation includes—but is not limited to—their interactions with European explorers, colonists, and eventually Americans. Teachers must be aware that publishers of children's books are businesses; their job is to sell books. As a result, these companies do not always ensure that the books they sell are historically accurate. In order to sell more books, publishing companies may potentially disregard historical accuracy, or historicity, by avoiding controversial topics. By doing so, the literature may not be representative of historical people and events. This ahistoricity could emerge in books about Native Americans that narrow their focuses to only include information about their culture, religion, or folktales and give little reference to the historical path they took from controlling North America to being isolated and marginalized. This ahistoricity could also emerge through the omission or significant minimization of accounts about violence. Historical misrepresentations can take many forms (Bickford, 2013; Williams, 2009). Heroification and villainification each happen when one person is given entirely more credit/blame for changing history than is deserved. Exceptionalism emerges when an atypical, extraordinary historical figure is portrayed as typical. Presentism occurs when people view the past with their contemporary perspectives or with information of which the historical figures were unaware. Omission surfaces when important information is excluded from a historical account.

Understanding historical misrepresentations is even more important now that Illinois has adopted the Common Core State Standards (CCSS), which have rigorous literacy expectations across content areas that begin in lower elementary school. CCSS expects educators to use an increased use of informational texts. More significantly, they stress the importance of using multiple informational texts so students can evaluate multiple perspectives. Through CCSS, students will begin to understand (and evaluate) the importance of the use of evidence, perspective, and bias. CCSS requires that teachers use primary and secondary informational texts. The children's literature represents the secondary informational texts. I located and modified primary sources that will balance out the historical misrepresentations within the secondary sources.

Methods

To conduct this research, I used inductive content analysis, a rigorous qualitative approach (Bickford, 2013). I first collected titles of children's tradebooks focused on the Native Americans published in the last quarter century. To generate a sizeable data pool, I used reliable and popular search engines to collect titles with reading levels of 1.0 – 4.0 (see Appendix I). To create a random and representative sample, I randomly selected 15 titles. Once the sample was created, I read a few books and recorded observable patterns and anomalies. This provided me with areas of historical representations and misrepresentations that were in need of evaluation (see Appendix II). I then read each book and recorded the findings, which were based on determining the frequency of emergent patterns of historical representation and misrepresentation. This qualitative research project – from the hypotheses to the data collection methods through the analytic techniques – follows best practice research.

Findings

Through inductive content analysis, I identified many patterns. Some findings would appear predictable, like book characteristics such as intended audience and genre. Other patterns are significant for elementary educators, like various forms of historical misrepresentation. These are detailed in the following subsections.

Intended Audience

I had originally intended to examine books for elementary students. I limited the data pool to only books intended for kindergarten through fifth-graders. The majority of books ($n = 9$; 60%) had intended audiences of upper elementary students in grades three through five. The rest of the books targeted early elementary students. This seems predictable considering the background knowledge needed for a reader to grasp distant historical events.

Genre

Knowing the topic is historical, the genre of the majority of books was not surprising. A simple majority of the books ($n = 8$; 53%) was singularly narrative non-fiction. A small percentage ($n = 3$; 20%) was distinctly historical fiction. Interestingly, a noticeable minority portion ($n = 4$; 27%) was of an unexpected genre: folktales, myths, and legends. Two were singularly so (Goble, 1998; Oughton, 1992) and two others were of mixed genre. One blended folktale with historical fiction (Bruhac, 2000b) and another combined folktale with narrative non-fiction (Lorenz & Schleh, 2004). Surprisingly, not a single book was distinctly expository.

Main Character and Demography

During analysis, I examined many aspects of the main character. I wanted to determine both the number of main characters in each book and their gender, ethnicity, and affiliations. This information relates to the perspective of the story. Research indicates that most children's books include only one perspective (Williams, 2009). Research has also indicated the overwhelming majority of books about contact between Native Americans and Europeans center on the perspective of European explorers (Bickford, 2013). I found one pattern to be present and another pattern to be absent.

First, the vast majority of books ($n = 13$; 87%) had one or two main characters, with all but one book (Ortiz, 2004) having a single main character. No books had more than two main characters. Of the two books that had no main characters, neither centered on a single historical person but instead focused on cultural aspects of Native America (Bruhac, 2002; Ashrose, 1993). This was similar to previous findings on number of main characters (Williams, 2009).

Second, every book ($n = 15$; 100%) focused entirely on the perspective of Native Americans. Not a single book centered on colonists or explorers from Europe or the emerging United States. This was quite different from the children's books about 1492 and Columbus's interactions with Native Americans, which had a majority—but not all—of the books written from the European perspective (Bickford, 2013).

Historical Implications of Contact

On a worldwide scale, Jared Diamond has examined how various societies emerge and conquer others (Diamond, 1999) while others collapse (Diamond, 2011). Within the Americas, Charles Mann has explored what native societies looked like prior to Columbus (Mann, 2005) and in the years after first contact (Mann, 2011). Scholars understand the conflicts, which were usually violent, that quickly emerged and the starvation, disease, and eventual demise that followed.

Since these things are violent, negative, and sad, I was not expecting the children's authors to include every aspect. I was also not expecting that the majority of books ($n = 9$; 60%) would disregard entirely all negative events and issues related to interactions between Europeans and Native Americans. I looked for discussion of the first contact, conflict, language barriers that contributed to misunderstanding, starvation, disease, the historical path Europeans would take, the historical path Native Americans would be forced to take, and anything else of relevance. A minority of books ($n = 6$; 40%) mentioned at least one implication of contact. Only two (13%) books include three or more aspects. (Such omission will be discussed below.)

Culture, Tradition, Religion, and Livelihood

Considering the lack of details provided about contact with European settlers and colonists, the abundance of details about Native Americans' lives and livelihoods was surprising. I examined the children's books to see what was mentioned about traditions, customs, religion, rights of passage, and obtaining food through farming, hunting, fishing, and gathering. Almost three-quarters of the books ($n = 11$; 73%) mentioned two or more aspects of culture and livelihood and three (20%) of these mentioned all of these (Ashrose, 1993; Lorenz & Schleh, 2002; Ortiz, 2004). A minority of books ($n = 4$; 27%) mentioned only one aspect.

Themes of Historical Misrepresentation

As noted in the introduction, there are many themes of historical misrepresentation. Presentism, chronological ethnocentrism, omission, exceptionalism, heroification, and villainification appear in many different ways in children's literature. Four were common in children's literature about Columbus (Bickford, 2013) and three were common in children's books about slavery (Williams, 2009). Omission was present in all of the children's books about Native Americans, but it was the only one that was common. Exceptionalism, heroification, and villainification emerged sporadically in just a single book or two. This omission centered on the conflicts and violence surrounding European-Native American contact.

It is positive and surprising that omission was the only prevalent theme of historical misrepresentation. Yet omission should not be taken lightly. Since only the perspective of the Native Americans was included (mentioned above) and because the majority of books disregarded the violence associated with contact with settlers and colonists, a young reader would likely not see two important aspects of this historical era. First, a young reader would not likely see Native Americans as being victimized. Second, a young reader would not likely see European settlers and colonists as the aggressors and perpetrators of violence. The bully/victim dynamic is overlooked when the interactions between Europeans and Native Americans is omitted. Native Americans, therefore, are presented as a distant relic of a bygone era or as a modern anomaly without a past. In fact, only one book connected the historical past with contemporary presence of Native Americans (Ashrose, 1993).

Primary Source Materials

Figure 1.

Totem Pole Glossary

Raven: The mercurial trickster of Northwest Coast Native lore. Curious and mischievous, often misbehaving but never boring

Sea Turtle: This totem is representative of Mother Earth

Thunderbird: A mythological bird known to manifest the rolling of thunder while beating its wings and creating lightening when blinking its eyes. Known to kill whales

Eagle: Intelligent and resourceful. He rules the sky and is able to transform himself into a human

Wolf: Very powerful totem who can help people that are sick or in need

Bear: A teacher symbol as it is believed that Bear taught the People to catch salmon and pick berries

Frog: Known for bringing wealth and is associated with Copper Woman. In another myth, frog was held down in fire, when it burst lava flowed and engulfed an entire village

Otter: The otter is a mischievous creature that is also a symbol of laughter, curiosity, grace, and empathy

Salmon: The salmon symbolizes instinct, persistence, and determination

Owl: The owl is a very respected animal and is thought to symbolize the souls of the departed

Killer Whale: Whales are honored as strong and brave fish. The mythology of the killer whale is that it will bring food and assistance to a chief or other important person lying helpless and/or wounded

Note. Interpretation varies by tribe <http://www.gullitotempoles.com/TotemPoleSymbols.html>

Figure 2. Native Americans holding up their hands toward totem pole. Chicago Daily News, Inc., photographer. Published 1929. Summary: Image of a group of Native American adults and children wearing traditional Native American clothing and headdresses standing next to a totem pole on a field in Chicago, Illinois, holding up their hands toward totem pole. A crowd is standing in the background. Notes: This photonegative taken by a Chicago Daily News photographer may have been published in the newspaper. Cite as: DN-0088619, Chicago Daily News negatives collection, Chicago History Museum.

Figure 3. Haida longhouse with pole in front.

http://members.home.nl/t.overberg1/Totem_Pole.htm

In Oraíbi they were living, and at the Hohóyaw village lived the Hohóyawtu (certain black Beetles). It was always hot and the wind was blowing, and it did not rain. As these Beetles drink rain-water they became very thirsty. Some became so thirsty that they died. So their chief said one time: "Let us have a dance and perhaps if we dance it will rain, because if it does not rain we shall all die!" "Very well, we shall have a dance," they said, "and maybe it will rain then. and we shall not die." So one evening they assembled to practice for the dance and their chief made a little song for them. This they were practicing. They practiced a while in the evening, and then they went to sleep. The next day they were going to have their dance. Early in the morning they got up and their chief made four nakwákwois for them. He deposited the nakwákwois west of their little village, and spoke to the clouds in the San Francisco mountains saying: "We are thirsty here, so you come quickly this way and bring us some water that we may drink and not die." So he returned to their village and they dressed up for the dance. They painted their bodies black, and then they danced. They were in a hurry because they were thirsty. Their chief began to pray to the clouds in the San Francisco Mountains. "Come this way quickly and bring us water." So they were formed in a line now and one of them acted as leader. By this time a cloud was forming in the mountains. They now sang the following song: Yoookwaa yoookwahayaha, Rain, rain. ~~As they were~~ As they were singing, the clouds came nearer and it began to rain and thunder, and the water began to fall so that they could now drink. When they had quenched their thirst they were very happy and ran about because they were no longer thirsty.

Figure 4. How the Beetles Produced Rain. Told by Kwáyeshva, (Oraíbi). The Traditions of the Hopi, by H.R. Voth, [1905], at sacred-texts.com.

Historical Topics

Why will you take by force what you may obtain by love? Why will you destroy us who supply you with food? What can you get by war? ... We are unarmed, and willing to give you what you ask, if you come in a friendly manner. ... I am not so simple as not to know it is better to eat good meat, sleep comfortably, live quietly with my women and children, laugh and be merry with the English, and being their friend, trade for their copper and hatchets, than to run away from them. ... Take away your guns and swords, the cause of all our jealousy, or you may die in the same manner.

Figure 1. Speech by Powhatan, as recorded by John Smith <http://www.smithsoniansource.org>

Since that you are heere strangers and come into our Country, you should rather confine yourselves to the Customes of our Country, than impose yours upon us.

Figure 2. A wicomesse Indian to governor of Maryland, 1633 <http://www.smithsoniansource.org>

Figure 3. The Deerfield Massacre of 1704, in which Indians and French allies attacked and burned the settlement.

“Colonel Chivington did, on the morning of the 29th of November, surprise attack ... camp of friendly Indians and massacre a large number of them, (mostly women and children,) and did allow the troops of his command to mangle and mutilate them in the most horrible manner.”

Figure 4. S.G. Colley, U.S. Indian Agent, Report, Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War, 38th Congress, 2nd Session, 1865.

“A long time ago this land belonged to our fathers; but when I go up to the river I see camps of soldiers here on its bank. These soldiers cut down my timber; they kill my buffalo; and when I see that, my heart feels like bursting; I feel sorry.”

Figure 3. Santana, Chief of the Kiowas, 1867. U.S. Bureau of Ethnography Annual Report, 17th, 1895.

"I am tired of fighting. Our chiefs are killed... He who led the young men is dead. It is cold and we have no blankets. The little children are freezing to death. My people, some of them have run away to the hills and have no blankets, no food; no one knows where they are-perhaps freezing to death. I want to have time to look for my children and see how many I can find. Maybe I shall find them among the dead. Hear me my chiefs. I am tired; my heart is sick and sad. From where the sun now stands, I will fight no more forever."

Figure 6. Indian Chief Joseph of the Nez Perce, upon his surrender to the U.S. government troops, September 1877.

Figure 5. "Promise of the High Plains," ca. 1880s in The Railroaders. Library of Congress, Rare Book and Special Collections Division (Call # Portfolio 20, Folder 16)

Discussion

My findings contribute to both the field of history education research and also to elementary classrooms. First, there is limited research on historical representations within children's literature. Second, CCSS requires increases in students' reading of informational texts. In the recent past, history content was reduced in the elementary schools. Teachers often rely on children's tradebooks to incorporate history into their curriculum; however, they are likely unaware that children's tradebooks can be so historically misrepresentative. While there have been no less than a dozen studies in the last two decades on historical misrepresentations within textbooks, the same is not true for children's tradebooks (Bickford, 2013).

There is limited research on the historical representations within children's literature. Findings from the research on historical representations within children's literature indicate the presence of historical misrepresentations, but the scope and depth are limited and the vast majority did not use rigorous research methods (Field & Singer, 2006; MacLeod, 1998; Williams, 2009). Bickford (2013), my mentor for this research, was one of the few researchers to examine the historical representations within children's literature. This study expands the field of social studies education research on children's literature. This study will support teachers because it will identify representative and accurate children's literature—and age-appropriate and truncated primary source material—that can be used in the classroom.

Appendix I – Data Pool

- Ashrose, C. (1993). The Very First Americans. New York, NY: Grosset & Dunlap, Inc.
- Brownridge, W. (1995). The moccasin goalie. Custer, WA: Orca Book Publishers.
- Bruhac, J. (2000a). Squanto's journey: The story of the first Thanksgiving. San Diego, CA: Harcourt, Inc.
- Bruhac, J. (2000b). Crazy Horse's vision. New York, NY: Lee & Low Books, Inc.
- Bruchac, J. (2002). Seasons of the circle: A Native American year. Singapore: BridgeWater Books.
- Capaldi, G., & Pearce, Q. (2011). Red Bird Sings. Minneapolis, MN: Carolrhoda Books.
- Edwardson, D., D. (2003). Whale Snow. Watertown, MA: Charlesbridge.
- Erdrich, L. (2003). Sacagawea. Minneapolis, MN: Carolrhoda Books, Inc.
- Francis, L. D. (2011). Kunu's basket: A story from Indian Island. Gardiner, ME: Tilbury House, Publishers.
- Goble, Paul. (1998). Ikotomi and the boulder. Orchard Books: New York City, NY.
- Lorenz, A. & Schleh, J. (2004). Journey to Cahokia: A boy's visit to the Great Mound City. New York, NY: Harry N. Abrams, Inc.
- Ortiz, S. J. (2004). The Good Rainbow Road. Tucson: The University of Arizona Press.
- Oughton, J. (1992). How the stars fell into the sky. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.
- Perrow, A. (2010). Many Hands: A Penobscot Indian Story. Down East.
- Sneve, V. D. H. (2011). The Christmas Coat: Memories of My Sioux Childhood. New York: NY: Holiday House, Inc.

Appendix II – Research Instrument for Native American-Based Literature

1. Author's name, publication date, title, company.
2. For (about) what age/grade was this book intended?
 - a. Primary (k-2)
 - b. Intermediate (3-5)
3. What is the book's genre?
 - a. Historical fiction
 - b. Narrative non-fiction
 - c. Expository
 - d. Graphic novel
 - e. Something else
4. Who were the main characters? Describe the main characters.
 - a. Name
 - b. Age
 - c. Gender
 - d. Ethnicity/race/religious/tribe/occupation/role affiliation (European, Settler, American, Colonists, Explorers, Pilgrims, Puritans; North American, Indian, Native American, Wampanoag, or Pokanoket)
 - e. Was this person important enough to be given a speaking line?
 - f. Anything else of relevance
5. What historical events/issues were mentioned? Describe in detail.
 - a. First meeting
 - b. Conflict
 - c. Language barriers
 - d. Starvation
 - e. Disease
 - f. The historical path the European settlers would take
 - g. The historical path the native cultures would take
 - h. Anything else of relevance
6. What about the Native American cultures were mentioned:
 - a. Animals
 - b. Farming
 - c. Hunting, fishing, and gathering
 - d. Traditions/customs
 - e. Rights of passage
 - f. Religion
7. Which common historical misrepresentations emerged:
 - a. Presentism
 - b. Chronological ethnocentrism
 - c. Omission
 - d. Exceptionalism
 - e. Heroification
 - f. Villainification
8. How did the narrative end?
9. Were any primary sources incorporated? If yes, in the foreword, narrative, afterward?
10. Were there any parts of the book historically inaccurate or implausible?

References

- Bickford, J. (2013). Examining historical (mis)representations of Christopher Columbus within children's literature. Social Studies Research & Practice, 8(2), 1-24.
- Common Core State Standards Initiative (2010). Common Core state standards for English/language arts and literacy in history/social studies, science, and technical subjects. Washington, DC: Department of Education.
- Diamond, J. (1999). Guns, germs and steel: The fates of human societies. London: Vintage.
- Diamond, J. (2011). Collapse: How societies choose to fail or succeed. New York, NY: Penguin.
- Field, L. & Singer, J. (2006). Talking with children about the Columbian Exchange. Social Studies and the Young Learner, 18(4), 24–26;
- MacLeod, A. (1998). Writing backward: Modern models in historical fiction. Horn Book Magazine, 74, 26.
- Mann, C. (2005). 1491: New revelations of the Americas before Columbus. New York: Alfred A. Knopf Publications.
- Mann, C. (2011). 1493: Uncovering the new world Columbus created. New York: Alfred A. Knopf Publications.
- National Council for the Social Studies (NCSS) (2010). National Curriculum Standards for Social Studies: A Framework for Teaching, Learning, and Assessment. Silver Spring, MD: Library of Congress Publications.
- Williams, T. (2009). A closer look: The representation of slavery in the Dear America series. Social Studies and the Young Learner 21, no. 3 (2009): 26-29.

Annotated Bibliography

Ashrose, C. (1993). The Very First Americans. New York, NY: Grosset & Dunlap, Inc.

This book was acquired on an interlibrary loan from the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. The Very First Americans contributed to this research because it was evaluated for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Bickford, J. (2013). Examining historical (mis)representations of Christopher Columbus within children's literature. Social Studies Research & Practice, 8(2), 1-24.

While completing this study, I used this article as my guide to model my own research. This article explained how to conduct a content analysis. This was particularly helpful because I, too, used a content analysis to analyze each book for its representations of Native Americans. I also used this article to gain background knowledge on what similar research had been conducted before.

Brownridge, W. R. (1995). The moccasin goalie. Custer, WA: Orca Book Publishers.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. It was one examined for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Bruhac, J. (2000a). Squanto's journey: The story of the first Thanksgiving. San Diego, CA: Harcourt, Inc.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. It was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Bruhac, J. (2000b). Crazy Horse's vision. New York, NY: Lee & Low Books, Inc.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. It was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Bruchac, J. (2002). Seasons of the Circle: A Native American Year. Singapore: BridgeWater Books.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. It was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Capaldi, G., & Pearce, Q. (2011). Red Bird Sings. Minneapolis, MN: Carolrhoda Books.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. In this study, it was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Common Core State Standards Initiative (2010). Common Core state standards for English/language arts and literacy in history/social studies, science, and technical subjects. Washington, DC: Department of Education.

The Common Core State Standards are a state/national initiative teachers must use as a guide for teaching. The Common Core State Standards were developed to aid in ensuring that each student receives a high quality education. The standards detail the cognitive tasks that students in each grade should be able to complete. Elementary students, for example, are expected to refer to textual evidence during primary source analysis; distinguish the implicit bias or perspective of an author and explicit purpose of the author's primary source; recognize fact, opinion, and reasoned judgment within a primary source; and examine the relationship between a primary and secondary source of the same topic. In completing the research, I intended to aid teachers by creating age-appropriate and abridged primary source materials that they could use to create high quality activities aligned with the Common Core State Standards, specifically those mentioned above.

Diamond, J. (1999). Guns, germs and steel: The fates of human societies. London: Vintage.

After reading the chapters my mentor, Dr. J. Bickford, referred me to, I gained a stronger background on how and why people of certain regions flourished and others did not. This is especially important for this study because the study is based on European-Native American interactions. The author explained and argued that the reason that Europeans became so dominant is because Europe is longitudinally oriented. The author made the point that this was critical to their early success because when traveling, the climate stayed the same throughout. In all other continents, the climate changes the farther north or south one travels. This is important because historically when people were traveling, they had to carry more/fewer items depending on the climates they were going to endure. The author also claims that Europe became more dominant because they had more domestic animals than other continents. For example, Europeans could domesticate and eat cows. Other continents were not as fortunate and had other animals, such as horses, that were not as good for eating/domesticating. Learning this information was helpful because it me perspective as to why Europeans were able to dominate others, including the Native Americans.

Diamond, J. (2011). Collapse: How societies choose to fail or succeed. New York, NY: Penguin.

After reading the chapters to which my mentor, Dr. J. Bickford, referred me, I increased my background knowledge on why certain societies self destructed and/or were conquered. The author made the claim that certain societies self destructed by misusing their available resources. Other societies failed because they were under constant attack from outsiders.

Edwardson, D., D. (2003). Whale Snow. Watertown, MA: Charlesbridge.

This book was borrowed on an interlibrary loan from National-Louis University. To facilitate this research, this book was analyzed for its representations of Native Americans.

Erdrich, L. (2003). Sacagawea. Minneapolis, MN: Carolrhoda Books, Inc.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. In this study, it was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Field, L. & Singer, J. (2006). Talking with children about the Columbian Exchange. Social Studies and the Young Learner, 18(4), 24–26.

This was one of the resources cited in Bickford (2013). This resource contributed to this study because it is a non-rigorous study in that the authors only examined five books about Christopher Columbus. Therefore, it taught me what a non-rigorous research paper looks like and served as a guide in creating my research paper.

Francis, L. D. (2011). Kunu's Basket: A Story from Indian Island. Gadenier, ME: Tilbury House, Publishers

This book was borrowed on an interlibrary loan from Elmhurst College. To facilitate this research, this book was analyzed for its representations of Native Americans.

Goble, P. (1998). Ikotomi and the Boulder. Orchard Books: New York City, NY.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. In this study, it was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Lorenz, A., Schleh, J. (2004). Journey to Cahokia: A Boy's Visit to the Great Mound City. New York, NY: Harry N. Abrams, Inc.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. To facilitate this study, it was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.

Mann, C. (2005). 1491: New revelations of the Americas before Columbus. New York: Alfred A. Knopf Publications.

After reading the chapters to which my mentor, Dr. J. Bickford, referred me, my knowledge about the diversity, culture, and history of the Native Americans of both North and South America increased. The authors of this article claimed that the Western Hemisphere was widely populated and sophisticated before Columbus arrived. This information was pertinent to this study because it allowed me to examine the books with a wider and more detailed background knowledge on the history of Native Americans of both North and South America.

Mann, C. (2011). 1493: Uncovering the new world Columbus created. New York: Alfred A. Knopf Publications.

After reading the chapters to which my mentor, Dr. J. Bickford, referred me, I gained a greater background knowledge on how Columbus and the subsequent explorers, conquerors and colonists destroyed the native people. The information from these chapters is useful for this study because it details the interactions of Europeans and Native Americans. These chapters are also useful because their content is directly related to the content from Diamond's (2011) book.

National Council for the Social Studies (NCSS) (2010). National Curriculum Standards for Social Studies: A Framework for Teaching, Learning, and Assessment. Silver Spring, MD: Library of Congress Publications.

This article provided me with the best practices for teaching social studies. This information directly impacted this study because it allowed me to identify primary sources that would supplement the children's literature that was evaluated. The article explicitly discussed encouraging students to use specific thinking patterns when reading and interpreting primary sources. These thinking patterns include source, context, corroboration, credibility, and "reading the silence" (what is said, how it is said, and what is left unsaid). These appear as questions like, who is—and what is known about—the speaker/writer? What type of document is it and what implications are inherent with this type of document? Who is—and what is known about—the intended audience? When—and what is known about—the time period in which this document was created? Through this document, to what or whom is the speaker/writer responding? Are there other documents or perspectives that corroborate or refute this speaker's/writer's claims? Most importantly, what does this document do? Students need to learn to first reflect on these queries prior to reading a primary source in order to purposefully read it. By including primary sources in the paper, we encourage teachers to use these best practices when teaching social studies.

Ortiz, S. J. (2004). The Good Rainbow Road. Tuscon, AZ: The University of Arizona Press.

This book was borrowed on an interlibrary loan from Elmhurst College. To facilitate this research, it was analyzed for its representations of Native Americans.

Oughton, J. (1992). How the stars fell into the sky. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

This book was borrowed on an interlibrary loan from Western Illinois University. To facilitate this research, it was analyzed for its representations of Native Americans.

Perrow, A. (2010). Many Hands: A Penobscot Indian Story. Down East.

This book was borrowed on an interlibrary loan from Elmhurst College. To facilitate this research, this book was analyzed for its representations of Native Americans.

Williams, T. (2009). A closer look: The representation of slavery in the Dear America series. Social Studies and the Young Learner 21, no. 3 (2009): 26-29.

Similarly to the article by Field and Singer (2006), this article was cited in Bickford (2013). It also contributed to this study because it is another example of a non-rigorous study. This resource allowed me to see that non-rigorous and non-empirical research can provide illustrative and interesting findings.

Sneve, V. D. H. (2011). The Christmas Coat: Memories of My Sioux Childhood. New York: NY: Holiday House, Inc.

This book is from Booth Library's Ballenger Teacher Center. To facilitate this study, it was analyzed for its historical representations of Native Americans.