Collective Bargaining in the Great Recession

Randi Weingarten
_American Federation of Teachers_

Follow this and additional works at: https://thekeep.eiu.edu/jcba

Recommended Citation

DOI: https://doi.org/10.58188/1941-8043.1173
Available at: https://thekeep.eiu.edu/jcba/vol0/iss4/5
Notes

- Collective bargaining in this great recession
  - We should adhere to effective collective bargaining strategies in good times and in bad. This is not advice for a recession only.
  - What’s effective?
    - When labor and management talk about their commonalities, rather than the issues that divide them.
    - When labor and management develop trust and learn to put themselves in the position of the other.
  - Instead of bickering, labor and management should use this time to begin thinking about how colleges and universities should work, especially when we have a President committed to higher education.

- An Administration committed-
  - The Obama Administration understands that the economy and education are connected.
  - We now have access to the White House
  - This is an opportunity for labor and management, but we have to work together to take full advantage of it.
    - For example, we have shared interests in the budget battle.

- The climate between labor and management
  - Getting along, trusting one another is conducive to breaking out of the box.
  - Getting along will lead us to solving all other issues.
  - Two issues labor and management must address in higher ed:
    - The contingent faculty dilemma
    - What happens to the university when you don’t have fulltime faculty
      - What happens to the robustness of the university
      - What happens to the university’s culture
      - What negative effects students feel